Research Update

Do children with hearing loss learn to modify their speech when interacting with younger normal-hearing infants and children? Dr. Maria Kondaurova and her undergraduate student, Kailin Kinney, presented a poster at the International Conference on Infant Studies June 30-July 3, 2018 in Philadelphia, PA that examined how two children with hearing loss interacted with a younger infant. The older children, one of whom had bilateral cochlear implants and another a BAHA (bone anchored hearing aids) system, were asked to play with a younger infant and with their own mothers, explaining how to assemble Mr. Potato Head. The results demonstrated that children with hearing loss used higher intonation, slower speech rate and shorter vocalizations when addressing younger infants as compared to their mothers. This is the first study that demonstrated that children with hearing loss learn to modify their speech characteristics depending on their listener.

It is possible that the speech and language intervention sessions received by these children at Heuser Hearing Institute contributed to the child's awareness of differences between infant-directed and adult-directed speech patterns as normal-hearing children recruited as controls did not demonstrate the same results. Dr. Kondaurova hopes to test more children from Heuser Hearing Institute in fall 2018 in order to confirm these exciting findings. In addition, Dr. Kondaurova will present two more projects at the International Conference on Infant Studies in Philadelphia. One poster, completed with her graduate speech-language pathology student, Sabrina D'Souza, will present data on speech characteristics of Latin American immigrant mothers who use English as a second language. It is worth noting that Sabrina received the first place in poster competitions at the recent Kentucky Speech-Language-Hearing Association meeting in 2018 for presenting this project. Dr. Kondaurova will also present a talk (as a second author) at the International Conference on Infant Studies on a collaborative project with researchers from Purdue University, discussing the alignment between speech and touch as mothers interact with their children who are hard of hearing.

Protect Your Hearing This Summer

It's summertime, and the livin' is easy. But outdoor activities can lead to noise-induced hearing loss if you are not careful. People of all ages should take extra precautions to protect their hearing during the summer months.

When the weather is warm, our natural inclination is to go outside. Many popular summer activities can be hazardous to our ears due to high decibel levels. Prolonged exposure to the sounds of lawn mowers, power tools, motorized vehicles, sporting events, concerts and fireworks can all lead to irreversible hearing damage. Fortunately, there are steps you can take to keep your ears safe and prevent long-term damage. The following tips are recommended by the Better Hearing Institute, an organization devoted to educating the public about proper hearing health and helping those with hearing loss benefit from proper treatment.

- Use earplugs When you are going to be exposed to loud sounds, wear earplugs to prevent damage to your hearing. Disposable earplugs made of foam or silicone are readily available and will allow you to hear music and conversations while blocking dangerously loud sounds. Custom ear protection crafted from earmolds will perfectly fit the unique contours of your ears, guaranteeing a snug, proper fit and dependable protection.
- Leave the fireworks to the professionals. Fireworks are synonymous with the 4th of July, but they represent an extreme noise hazard and should be restricted to professionals. The bang from a single firecracker at close range can cause immediate and permanent hearing damage. When watching fireworks, enjoy them from a distance. Earplugs will provide an extra level of hearing protection without detracting from the festivities.
- Take measures to protect against swimmer's ear. There's nothing more refreshing than a cool swim on a hot day, but when water enters the ear canals, it can lead to a painful infection known as swimmer's ear. To protect against this, invest in a pair of swimmer's plugs. Dry your ears thoroughly after swimming, and make sure to tilt your head to the side to drain any residual water from your ear canals. Avoid swimming in water where bacterial counts are high (look for signs posted at the local beach).
